A message to a prospective career college student

If you're reading this message, there's a strong chance that you're looking for your next career and are trying to decide what training to take in order to advance your future.

Some readers of this magazine will be high school students deciding on what to do next. Others will be individuals who work in a job that does not meet their needs or expectations. And finally, some will have just found themselves unemployed and are looking for their next career. Regardless of what your situation is, your choice for education is an important one.

The good news is that you have a choice. You can choose a university, a community college or a regulated career college. Each type of educational institution offers different types of benefits, opportunities and choices. It is important for you to look at each and decide what best suits your needs.

Most people know what universities and community colleges offer. They are public institutions funded by governments that offer a variety of programs with a heavily subsidized model.

So, what about regulated career colleges? Why would you want to choose one of these institutions? Clearly it depends on you, but this is why some students choose regulated career colleges:

- They are looking for innovative programs that follow industry needs and changes in the labour market;
- They want to attend an educational institution that has close relationships with employers;
- They want flexibility in schedules and class starts;
- They want to be more than a number and want to be in small classes with the ability to develop a relationship with an instructor.

Regulated career colleges offer a different experience. There are no fancy buildings and layers of staff. You will find, for the most part, entrepreneurs with a passion for education, people who want to better other people's lives and individuals who think that it is possible to do it outside a regimented government system.

I agree. Regulated career colleges offer an attractive, innovative and flexible option. Provincial governments heavily regulate them – and that's to protect you – but they still retain their capacity to find ways to go the extra mile to help their students, develop new programs, find new partnerships with employers, etc.

It is important that you take the time to consider all your options. And, if you find a career college that offers a program that you're interested in, go and talk to admissions people, other students, ask to speak to graduates and look at the reputation of the college. This is an important decision and you should take the time to choose well.

Together, we help shape Canada. All of us. We all have a role to play. Doctors wouldn't be able to practice without nurses, medical office assistants and a number of other professions in health care. Engineers need drafting technicians. Great movie directors need actors. So, to enable yourself to play the role that you want to play, provide for yourself, start your career or start again in a new career – make the right educational choice.

I look forward to meeting you during one of my visits of the many career colleges in our beautiful country.

Practical information for prospective students

As a wide range of industries in Canada face talent shortages, many students – especially those with previous education and work experience – are choosing career colleges for sector-specific training and credentials.

Most jobs require some form of post-secondary training, whether that's a degree, a certificate, or an industry-specific certification. Many employers prefer to hire someone who's already trained in their field. The skills learned in a career college are practical and reinforced through hands-on training. As well, "soft skills" such as communication and professionalism are prioritized throughout by instructors who have experience in the field they are teaching.

Why choose a career college?

Studies show you'll have several jobs during your lifetime, and specialized training can better prepare you for each new opportunity. The labour market is constantly changing, and adaptability is key to staying relevant and competitive.

Most jobs require some form of post-secondary training, whether that's a degree, a certificate, or an industry-specific certification. Many employers prefer to hire someone who's already trained in their field. The skills learned in a career college are practical and reinforced through hands-on training. As well, "soft skills" such as communication and professionalism are prioritized throughout by instructors who have experience in the field they are teaching.

What's a career college?

A career college is an independently owned post-secondary institution that focuses on training students for specific jobs or industries, with an emphasis on hands-on learning from instructors experienced in their field. Graduates receive diplomas or certificates, depending on the program, and enter the working world with connections to employers and practical experience in their industry. Though career colleges are not publicly funded, many students are still eligible for provincial financial aid.

What can I study?

Career colleges offer training in a wide variety of industries such as business, health care, information technology, tourism and horticulture. Some train students for very specific career paths, such as law enforcement. Others offer a range of programs within a specialized industry such as horticulture, while others have programs that teach widely applicable skills such as business administration.

Due to their connections with employers and industry professionals, career colleges are highly adaptable to the needs of both students and industry.

Many career college programs are just as focused, training brewery technicians, hairstylists, film crews, those in the culinary arts and many more for industries that require specific skills and credentials.

How long does it take?

Career college programs range from shorter 12-week certificates to one- or two-year programs, depending on the school or program; some specialty programs may be longer, offering more advanced certifications based on industry standards.

The shorter program length means colleges can train students faster, and students don't need four years or more to get into their chosen career path. These programs often have multiple intake seasons to train students year-round.

What's it like?

Class sizes are small, usually less than 30 people, making it easier for students to engage with each other and the instructor. These instructors have experience in the field they are teaching or are still working in that field while teaching.

Classes are meant to teach students real-world knowledge and skills instead of the more theoretical focus of universities, often with the addition of practicums or internships. These can lead to full-time employment opportunities for many students, which means a job soon after graduation. Employers often rely on these internships and their relationships with career colleges to find new hires with up-to-date, reliable training.

As well, many career colleges offer flexible scheduling to accommodate students who are working or have other obligations such as parental duties.

Who oversees career colleges?

All Canadian career colleges are regulated by provincial or territorial governments. Many career college programs are also overseen by an independent professional licensing body, such as the Law Society of Upper Canada, to ensure programs are up-to-date on industry standards.

Career colleges are represented at the national level by the National Association of Career Colleges (NACC), of which almost all provincial associations are also members.

Who attends career colleges?

Students who attend career colleges come from a diverse range of backgrounds.

A recent study by Career Colleges Ontario found that more than half of career college students in the province had both previous post-secondary education and work experience. Many of them were first-generation immigrants looking to gain credentials in Canada. More than half were switching careers, and in general the average age of students was slightly higher than at community colleges or universities.

Students who are newcomers to Canada may find that career college programs can help them gain a certification in a field they already have experience in, as well as connect them with potential employers. These students say the programs are also a chance to meet people and get comfortable in their new home, gaining confidence in their language skills and learning the ropes of Canada's labour market.

How to choose a career college

STEP 1: Choose a career or field of study

First, identify the careers you would like to explore. There are more than 1,200 career colleges in Canada, so narrowing them down by industry will make your search much easier.

Research different jobs within your chosen career field and find out what kinds of requirements they have for employment. Do they need a post-secondary education? A specific certification? Or are you taking a college program simply to make yourself more competitive among a sea of applicants?

Don't limit yourself to just one specific job; stay open to multiple opportunities that could take you where you want to go. It's important to keep your options open – you never know what you might find.

Take advantage of the experts, whether they're career counsellors at your high school or the administrators of the programs you're looking into. With insight into the job market and years of experience helping students find the right fit, it's important to take their advice into account. They might know about opportunities that will help you stay competitive, including volunteer positions, jobs and grants.

Here's another source of expertise: people who work in the field. Want to know what it's like to work that job you're eyeing? Ask the people doing that job, and find out how they got there. Maybe the program they took will be the right fit for you.

STEP 2: Find programs that fit your needs

With those requirements in mind, find programs that meet your needs. Are you already working full-time? Are you open to relocating for school? Perhaps you're looking for online learning opportunities? Many colleges are flexible when it comes to scheduling, so chances are there's one out there that works with your other priorities and commitments.

Take advantage of any opportunities to visit the schools you're considering. Many colleges will let you sit in on classes to get a feel for what the program is like.

If getting employed right out of college is a priority for you, look for colleges with a strong connection to employers in your field. Find out what kinds of internship or placement opportunities the school provides, since those can be an important resource for your post-graduation job options.

STEP 3: Make sure you fit the require- ments

Once you've identified a list of colleges that meet your needs and expectations, it's time to make sure you meet their requirements. Most colleges have a variety of intake schedules, so if you need to get anything updated before applying, you can do that at any time.

Cost is also an important factor when it comes to choosing a college. Start looking into funding opportunities – career colleges are not publicly funded, but you may still be eligible for provincial grants and loans. If you need to work while you're in school, talk to college administration to find out how they can work around your schedule.

Are you ready for the careers of tomorrow?

Spoiler alert: The answer is probably no. But with the right education, that can quickly change.

By some estimates, as many as 40 to 50 per cent of today's jobs will disappear in the coming decades, fuelled by technological advances that will render humans obsolete for certain tasks.

In a comprehensive report, the Brookfield Institute for Innovation + Entrepreneurship at Toronto's Ryerson University says that while automation was previously restricted to routine and manual tasks, breakthroughs in artificial intelligence and advanced robotics are pushing automation into cognitive spheres, including occupational tasks such as driving and conducting job interviews.

The Brookfield Institute says there is a probability of 70 per cent or higher that the most "at risk" jobs – including accounting clerk, administrative assistant, retail salesperson and transport truck driver – will be affected by automation over the next 10 to 20 years.

The fact that workers in some of these most susceptible jobs typically earn less and have lower education levels than the rest of the Canadian labour force only compounds the challenges.

But automation and artificial intelligence will not have a uniform impact across the Canadian labour market. As the C.D. Howe Institute noted in a recent commentary, careers that require abstract, complex-decision-making skills with a strong focus on creativity, critical thinking and interpersonal social skills have a relatively low risk of being automated. In fact, it's likely that demand for these skills will rise in the short and medium term.

However, technical job-specific skills can easily become obsolete relatively quickly. The C.D. Howe Institute says this indicates a need for continuous education and lifelong learning, with educational institutions such as career colleges playing an expanded role to help people learn to adapt to changing conditions.

An evolving job market

Progressive career colleges such as the Toronto School of Management (TSoM) understand precisely why it's vital to stay ahead of the curve when it comes to pre-

The challenge

"As digital and machine technology advances, the next generation of Canadians will need to be more adaptive, creative and collaborative, adding and refining skills to keep pace with a world of work undergoing profound change."

– RBC president and CEO Dave McKay, writing in a 2018 research paper titled, Humans wanted – How Canadian youth can thrive in the age of disruption. The report estimates that 50 per cent of Canadian jobs will be disrupted by automation over the next decade.

The solution

"Our ability to adapt to automation and a constantly changing job market by offering the students of today the skills that will be needed tomorrow is a cornerstone of what we do."

– Ehsan Safdari, managing director, Toronto School of Management. The career college is tapping into growing demand for skilled workers in the fields of artificial intelligence and robotics.

paring students for the future. The school was founded to deliver well-tailored, career-focused programs and it is now attracting students from across Canada and almost two dozen other nations, TSoM managing director Ehsan Safdari says.

At present, the school offers programs in hospitality and tourism, accounting, business administration and business management but it is also in the process of registering new programs in IT and computing with the Ontario government to tap into the growing demand for skilled workers in the fields of artificial intelligence and robotics.

“Our ability to adapt to automation and a constantly changing job market by offering the students of today the skills that will be needed tomorrow is a cornerstone of what we do at TSoM,” says Ehsan.

In its efforts to maintain its focus on the future, TSoM has a key weapon in its arsenal: being a part of the Global University Systems (GUS). It’s an international group of higher-education institutions, brought together by a shared passion for accessible, industry-relevant qualifications.

As part of a network of more than 50,000 students worldwide, attendees at TSoM benefit from shared services and resources that enhance their education, including study-abroad programs and international job opportunities.

Like all its GUS affiliates, TSoM’s professors are seasoned industry professionals with highly relevant work experience in their fields, plus a strong academic background.

“Career colleges are able to modify curriculum more quickly – that’s vital in our industry.”

– Drummond Wilson, technical support manager, Sophos

“This helps us in terms of thinking out of the box to ensure our graduates are ready for today and tomorrow,” says Ehsan, adding that the school looks at innovative methods of delivering material, including interactive learning, online simulations and case studies to expose students to a wide array of content and situations.

Students can gain practical experience through volunteering opportunities on and off campus. As an example, TSoM is establishing a non-profit coffee shop that will provide real-world experience as a student-run project.

Ehsan notes that the school leverages its business connections to offer students additional exposure to the real world, bringing in guest speakers from different industries as well as arranging field trips for students to see the realities of various fields as they plan for the future.

The majority of these guest speakers emphasize the necessity for adaptation and change. In addition, the school’s advisory committee – comprised of industry leaders – works with TSoM’s administrative and academic teams to make sure their students are getting what they need for the careers of tomorrow.

“For students of all ages, we narrow the gap between education and industry,” adds Ehsan. “We welcome those who are eager to retrain and gain confidence so they are ready to approach the job market and find the job they’ve always wanted. It’s never too late to go back to school,” he adds, noting the school has many students who already have Bachelor’s degrees, but saw the potential of a hands-on education that bridges theory and real work experience.

Connecting with employers

Providing condensed courses specifically geared to prepare students for the working world with the most up-to-date knowledge is one piece of the puzzle. Equally important is helping students connect to employers who are hiring.

A large, purpose-built student lounge in TSoM’s downtown Toronto campus makes it easy for industry partners to come in and hold career fairs.

“These partnerships really help students envision their future and take action towards achieving their career goals,” Ehsan says.

The partnership approach is one that is working well for career colleges across the country. One of the most successful collaborations aimed at preparing workers for the jobs of now and the future exists between Ottawa-based Willis College and Sophos, a global leader in IT security.

Drummond Wilson, the technical support manager at the Ottawa office of Sophos, says collaboration between industry and education is essential when it comes to ensuring students are equipped for the jobs of tomorrow.

“Working with Willis College’s Cybersecurity Academy is a perfect partnership from our perspective,” he says. “Career colleges are able to modify curriculum more quickly – that’s vital in our industry, as cybersecurity is constantly evolving (and) training needs to keep pace.”

Willis College offers highly focused programs that deliver job-ready graduates. Sophos works closely with the programs’ instructors, providing targeted curriculum materials, plus network appliances, to ensure students get real-world experience at the college.

“We stay in regular contact with Willis College to ensure the teaching staff has what it needs,” Drummond says. “We make sure they have the latest (skills) as we upgrade within the company; we are essentially keeping pace in tandem.”

The productive relationship between Willis College and Sophos is due to an initiative driven by Michael Anderson, Sophos’ senior vice-president of global technical services. He saw an opportunity for the company to partner with a local career college in each city where it has an office to provide a pipeline of talent.

Those hired from the career college benefit by having their first working world experience in a supportive environment, and many of those individuals go on to more advanced roles within the company.

Sophos has experienced tremendous local growth, fuelled by both customer demand and the availability of trained specialists.

“Our team has grown by 200 per cent over the last few years, with almost every new team member being a Willis graduate. The opportunity to hire those individuals has allowed our operation to scale up in a way that might not otherwise be possible,” says Drummond.

“We welcome those who are eager to retrain and gain confidence so they are ready to approach the job market and find the job they’ve always wanted.”

– Ehsan Safdari

He notes that the company needs a mix of new career college graduates as well as experienced individuals as the blend in ages and skills allows the firm to provide mentorship opportunities. Diversity is also important to the firm, as the company wants its team to reflect the changing nature of Ottawa and its customer base.

“To encourage this, we have hired people from all over the globe who have come to Ottawa to attend the cybersecurity program at Willis College,” Drummond says.

Willis College CEO Rima Aristocrat says one of the most important steps the school can take is to constantly monitor the labour-market demand for the skills students acquire in their programs.

“The fact that our graduates are in high demand among industry leaders like Sophos suggests that our approach is working, for both our students and the job market they are looking to enter.”

Leveraging previous job experience into a new career

Career colleges fill an important niche for skilled workers, giving them the tools they need to turn their talents and experiences into a rewarding career.

Many university graduates, for example, find themselves well-armed with theoretical knowledge but lacking in practical experience. Elsewhere, adults who have been working for many years may be seeking courses to bring their skills into the 21st century.

In both cases, and many other instances as well, career colleges are an ideal solution.

For example, Herzing College – which has campuses in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and Winnipeg – offers multiple pathways for those eager to prepare themselves for a rewarding and fulfilling career.

Orderlies and hospital volunteers learn to become health care aides and medical laboratory assistants. Individuals with a background in bookkeeping or accounting prepare for management positions through courses in business or payroll administration.

And, in a particularly popular field of study, experienced professionals are enrolling in a digital marketing specialist program that helps them keep pace with a rapidly changing landscape.

Kerry Swanson, president of Herzing College in Winnipeg, says the majority of the programs at his school are designed for those seeking to upgrade their skills.

“We appeal to the person who has graduated from high school and worked in a minimum wage job but is now ready to focus on their long-term future by upgrading their skills,” he says. “We also see lots of university graduates who want to bridge the gap by layering practical skills on top of their theoretical learning.”

Swanson says a third key demographic includes newcomers to Canada who may have an extensive educational background from their home country, but lack the specific degree or experience that’s required to pursue their line of work in Canada. Frequently hailing from the medical and legal communities, these individuals need retraining to work in their field.

A fourth group of students are adults who envision a different future for themselves and “are ready to make it happen,” Swanson says.

 The practical skills we teach are highly coveted by employers.”

– Kerry Swanson, president, Herzing College in Winnipeg

Lifelong learning

The federal government’s commitment to what it calls “lifelong learning” is encouraging a growing number of adult students to take a closer look at upgrading their skills at career colleges.

The 2017 and 2018 federal budgets expanded the eligibility of grant and loan programs for full- and part-time students who have children. Additionally, the federal government recently introduced a three-year pilot project to provide an additional $1,600 in annual grants for adults returning to school on a full-time basis after several years in the workforce. This pilot, which commenced on Aug.

1, 2018, will also make it easier for adult full-time students to qualify for grants to offset their drop in income while they are in school.

“The availability of grants for adult learners has definitely had a positive impact in the past on our enrollment, particularly among women looking to re-enter the workforce or change career paths,” says Robin Day, academic dean at Herzing Winnipeg.

To help prospective students see how their past experiences can open up future possibilities, Herzing has an online career assessment tool that can give indicators of their interests and aptitudes.

Swanson says the tool is extremely popular and the school’s admissions team finds prospective students are arriving more prepared as a result, allowing for a more detailed career exploration discussion.

Flexible education

Many career colleges understand the importance of offer flexibility to meet the needs of their students who need to continue working or caring for family members while enrolled in post-secondary education.

Herzing offers several options under its FlexEd umbrella, including an innovative Integrated Learning System (ILS) which sees online programs run synchronously with in-person programs, allowing students to choose on a day-to-day basis which platform they want to participate in.

Career college can also be ideal for people looking to test the waters in a new field, as part of a concept called “laddering.”

As Day explains, laddering offers the opportunity to advance one’s education and upgrade skills at an accelerated pace. Just like climbing a ladder, people can begin with a career college certificate before building on that foundation to work up to a diploma or degree.

By starting with career college, students get to find out quickly and in a cost-effective manner if their chosen field is appealing or not, rather than embarking on a long and expensive program of study only to decide after a few years that it is not a good fit.

Swanson says that for many people, it is the current job market that drives the need for retraining.

“Businesses are looking at things differently today; they all want experience as much as they want the credentials,” he says. “The practical skills we teach are highly coveted by employers.”

How to prepare for a job in:

Orthopaedic technician

Recent grad hired within a week of receiving diploma

Many career college students are people looking to switch gears, and orthopaedic technician Lynn Welch was one of those people – she had a degree in kinesiology, but after taking some time off to raise her children, she went back to work and realized she wasn't happy with her job.

After doing some research, Welch found a fairly new program: the orthopaedic technician diploma at Westervelt College in London, Ont. She graduated from the program's third-ever class of students, and had a job within a week.

Allan Findlay, an instructor at Westervelt College and an experienced orthopaedic technician, says the diploma program was created four years ago after a survey of fracture clinics across Canada found that traditional apprenticeship-style training was not providing professionals with enough experience.

Westervelt's program takes one year and is split into three semesters, each of which ends in a placement. The first two are observational, and the third is an eight-week, intensive hands-on placement that puts students alongside other orthopaedic technicians.

The placements are the ultimate learning experience, says Findlay, and they expose students to the wide range of environments they could end up working in, such as clinics, hospitals and operating rooms.

"They go out and they do everything that they're trained to do," he says.

Career ready

The skills learned in the program cover

“(Graduates) go out and they do everything that they're trained to do.”

– Allan Findlay, instructor, Westervelt College

everything an orthopaedic technician does, from casting to removing sutures and staples, caring for wounds and communicating with physicians. The relatively small classes – up to 19 at a time – allow students to engage with the instructor.

"We go through everything," says Findlay, adding that it's a very hands-on program designed to get students comfortable with the work of an orthopaedic technician. "They actually start casting right on the second day."

Welch says by the time her third placement was done, she felt ready to start her career. In fact, her placement resulted in a job; she now has a permanent part-time position at two Trillium hospitals in the Greater Toronto Area.

"That's why the focus on that practical aspect was so good," she says.

Findlay describes the job of an orthopaedic technician as essential to the patient experience in a fracture clinic. Communication is key, especially with patients suffering from acute wounds, and an important part of the technician's job is to relay medical information to the patient, including the next step in each process, in a way they can understand.

“We are basically like interpreters,” he says. “We spend the most time with them.”

Welch echoes this, adding that people skills are necessary for the job, as well as the ability to work in a fast-paced environment.

“You need to want to interact with people to do this work,” she says. “You have to be able to have a good rapport and relationship with people to put their mind at ease and to do the best job you can for them.”

Welch says she feels Westervelt’s program was essential to her training as an orthopaedic technician – and the full year was definitely needed, she adds.

“You need to have the proper education and practical background” before treating patients, she says. “I think you need that year to get yourself into a place where you’re technically skilled enough to do that.”

Law enforcement

Retirements and relocations create constant demand for police officers, corrections workers

At a time when the job market is constantly changing, there's one field that's been hiring for decades at a steady rate: law enforcement.

"There's such a dearth of jobs out there," says Victor Popow, the CEO of Northwest Law Enforcement Academy. He says there are hundreds of jobs in policing, investigation and corrections waiting to be filled, and many employers come to colleges such as Northwest for trained, confident graduates.

Popow says some form of post-secondary education is necessary for a career in law enforcement. But while some may spend four years in a classroom to get a criminology degree, there's a faster way to get that education – one that teaches you the hands-on skills necessary to get a job in law enforcement in less than a year.

Learning from experienced police officers, the academy's program sees a lot of students switching from university, says Popow, after they realize that hard skills are what will make them a competitive applicant.

"It's not theoretical knowledge, it's practical knowledge," he says.

Northwest Law Enforcement Academy was founded by a former Winnipeg police chief 18 years ago. Popow says the college has a "unique model" in that it trains students in a paramilitary style, complete with uniforms.

The instructors are all former members of the RCMP or Winnipeg police forces, which Popow says is a source of inspiration for many people in the program. Students learn about ranking structures, becoming fully immersed in the workplace culture that many jobs in law enforcement hold mandatory.

The curriculum covers criminal law and criminology, forensics, hands-on firearm and defensive tactic training, as well as more theoretical topics such as communications and ethics. The program sees between 60 and 70 graduates a year in three rounds, most of them between the ages of 18 and 25, but with several who come from other careers, says Popow.

"Our graduates have gone all over Canada," says Popow, adding that the program prepares students for a variety of job markets including corrections, the RCMP, provincial and municipal police forces, and more.

The program is also constantly under review, says Popow, adding modules that reflect the changing nature of policing. For example, they now teach mental health awareness and Indigenous issues, in response to topics that have become increasingly prevalent for law enforcement.

"We're constantly changing and looking at what we need to do to improve," says Popow. "It's a very dynamic program."

Credentials stand out

Though previous law enforcement experience isn't a requirement to apply to the Winnipeg Police Service recruitment program, Const. Dennis Lewis of the recruit selection unit says it certainly makes a candidate stand out.

"Having a police studies (education) is going to give someone a bit of an advantage, especially when it comes to training," he says. "It's not a mandatory requirement for us, but ... I think any police service is always going to be looking at hiring the most competitive applicant."

The rigorous training that selected recruits go through can be quite the learning curve, he says, so any applicant who has some level of previous experience will

“ Having a police studies (education) is going to give someone a bit of an advantage.”

– Const. Dennis Lewis,
recruit selection unit,
Winnipeg Police Service

find it much easier.

"One of the most important things that we're looking for is someone who is able to think under pressure," he says.

More importantly, he says he looks for recruits with a "no-quit," positive attitude, something he says he's more likely to find in someone who has committed to previous training. The selection process takes time and patience, and anyone who isn't willing to stick that out isn't right for the job, he says.

"(Previous training) shows that they've been preparing and they want to do this and they're trying to make themselves competitive in that field," says Lewis. "It's important to have that positive attitude throughout the whole process."

Northwest's paramilitary-style training also helps with the "culture shock," he says. Not all police forces are paramilitary organizations, but Winnipeg's is, and so previous exposure to that style of workplace is an asset. Facets of that culture such as uniforms or enforced ranking structures uphold a strong sense of respect and team-building, says Lewis.

"There's the teamwork side of things, there's that rank, that structure, knowing that you're doing this together," he says. "That's what policing is. You're a team out there, and you're helping each other out."

He says the Winnipeg police force hires around 70 new recruits every year, a number that candidates can count on due to retirement and relocation numbers. With three classes of recruits a year, "there's definitely lots of growth still happening," he says.

Golf course management

Communications, business planning and management skills help professionals rise up the ranks

Bill Cameron started working in the golf industry at the age of 16. What began as a summer job became a full-time career, and as Cameron gained more experience he worked a variety of jobs at different golf courses in Saskatchewan. He now works at Dakota Dunes Golf Links in Saskatoon, where he's been since the course opened in 2003.

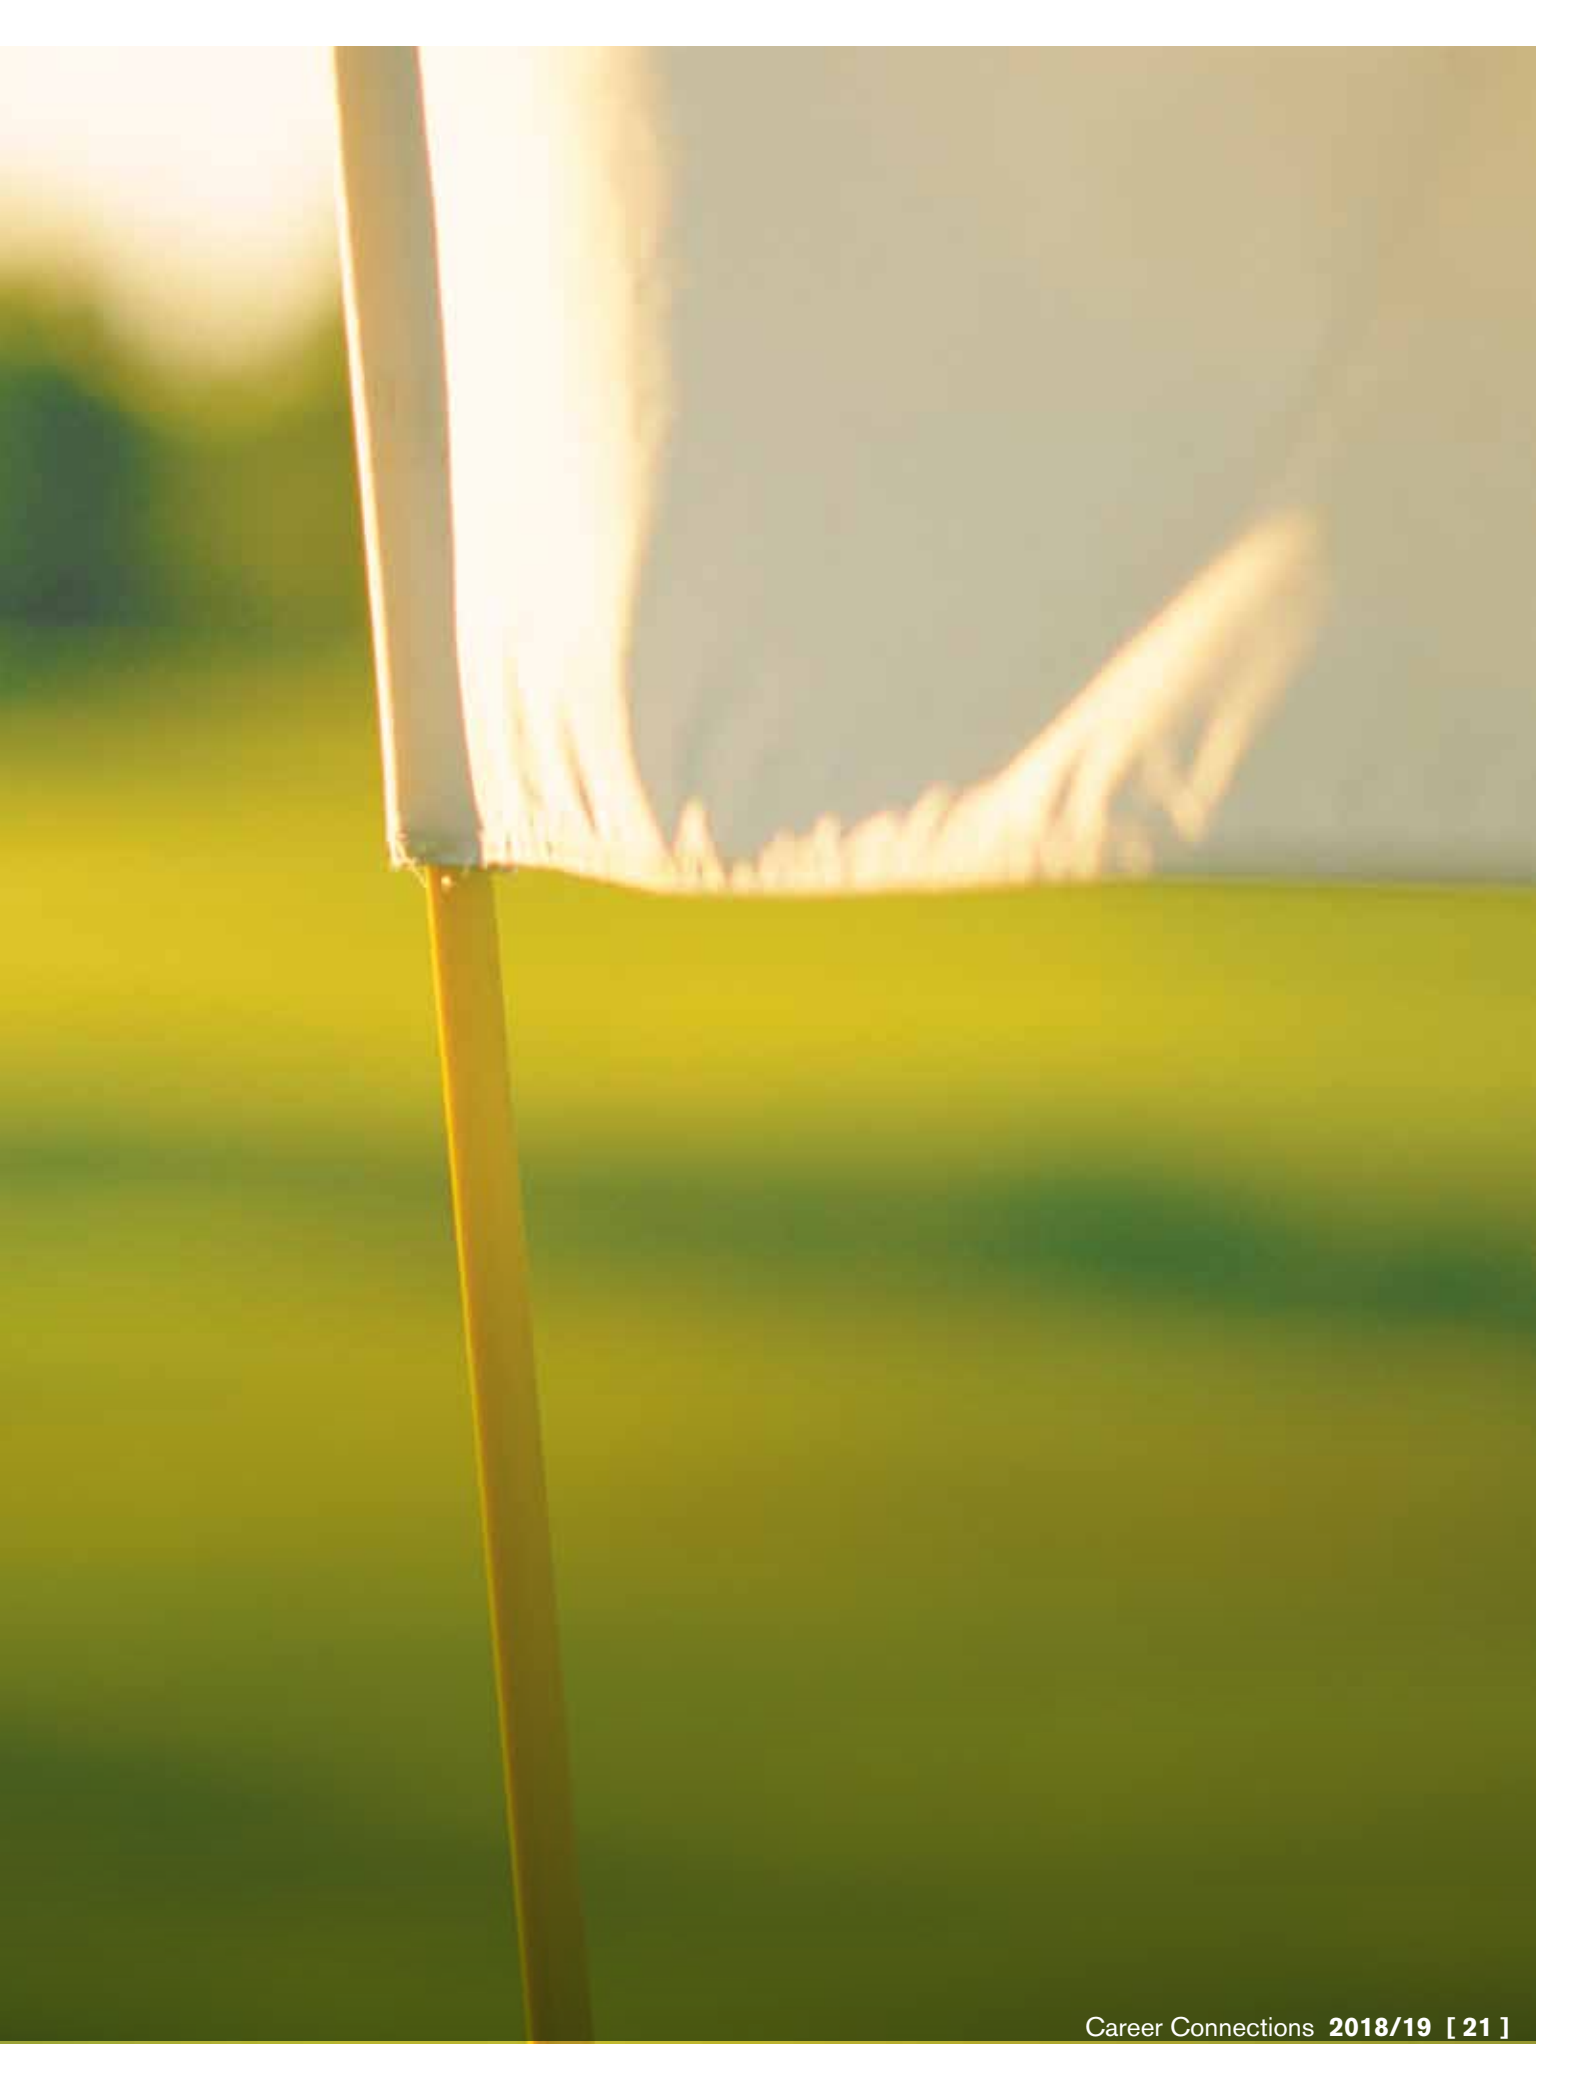

As time went by, Cameron saw himself moving up at Dakota Dunes, possibly into a management role such as superintendent.

"I knew I needed some education to further myself up the ladder," says Cameron.

After a bit of research, he found a program right in his hometown that offered what he needed to take his career to the next level.

The Saskatoon School of Horticulture has been operating for more than 15 years. The college's two-year Diploma in Horticulture offers up-to-date, hands-on learning that can be applied to many jobs in the horticulture industry, and also offers shorter programs.

The program begins with introductory courses on topics such as horticulture, pathology, pest management, turf management and more. Patricia Hanbidge, founder and lead horticulturist at the Saskatoon School of Horticulture, says the program is flexible and focused, with students taking only a couple of courses at a time.

“School should fit into life, instead of the other way around,” says Hanbidge. “Because we’re a small school, we have the opportunity to accommodate our students.”

Each course builds on the previous one, and students apply the knowledge they’ve learned at every step.

“That’s really fundamental for being able to hit the ground running,” says Hanbidge.

Attention to detail

Students also do professional development courses throughout the program, learning communications, business planning and management skills – the program is designed to prepare them for all aspects of the horticulture industry, which was especially useful for Cameron.

Because of his extensive experience in the golf industry, “I already knew a good portion of what I had to know before I went into the course,” says Cameron of the introductory courses, although he appreciated learning some of the scientific basis behind practices he’d been doing for years. But management skills and business know-how were things he would need if he wanted to rise up in seniority at Dakota Dunes. In one course, students had to come up with an entire business plan, including the finances.

“They throw you into situations,” says Cameron. “It kind of gave me a taste of that management side of things ... you come out way better.”

Cameron says the program furthered the knowledge he already had when it came to turf management and other maintenance practices. As well, he learned some skills he has applied to all areas of his job.

“Attention to detail is the biggest thing I’ve learned,” he says. “You have to have attention to detail to diagnose issues.”

After he graduated, Cameron worked as the assistant superintendent and then equipment technician at Dakota Dunes, putting some of the management skills he learned to the test. As a manager, he says the program gave him the confidence to lead people.

Hanbidge says though turf management is important, it’s those business and leadership skills that help students adapt to the many different roles at a golf course.

Tyler McComis, superintendent at Dakota Dunes and the instructor of the turf management course, says his job has become less about maintenance thanks to state-of-the-art irrigation technology and modernized modes of communication. Though horticulture knowledge is important, he says the softer skills such as management and finance taught in the program are just as relevant for anyone who wants to become a manager or superintendent.

“More than anything in today’s day and age ... I think the biggest thing is dealing with people,” says McComis, who has been working in the golf course industry for almost two decades.

He says it’s good that the program teaches both old-fashioned methods of maintenance as well as modern, high-tech methods, since some smaller golf courses in certain climates still do things the old-fashioned way. But he says the industry is always changing, and anyone in a management role at a golf course has a lot more than turf to deal with.

“You have to learn how to deal with those different generations,” he says, noting that Dakota Dunes employs people as young as 16 and as old as 72. “Growing grass is the easy part.”

Business administration

An international focus helps graduates tap into global opportunities

Every business has a team of people working to make their organization run smoothly, managing everything from payroll to customer relations. These business support roles require a range of skills that are in constant demand, which makes programs such as Evergreen College's two-year Diploma in Business Administration and International Trading key for students looking to stay competitive as they enter the job market.

Grace Ciano, an instructor in the program, says it's designed to bridge students into business administration in a wide range of industries. The ten modules cover every important aspect of business, including finance, legalities, marketing, research and supply chain management. As businesses increasingly focus on their global footprint, Ciano says the program teaches students the key skills needed to support a business that works with clients worldwide.

"Every time we have a module, we touch on the domestic side, and then we touch on the global side," says Ciano. "We're opening them to more global opportunity."

What employers want

Ciano, like the other instructors in the program, has years of experience in various fields.

"I try to make use of those experiences in the classrooms," she says, drawing upon real-world experiences to prepare students for their careers. Her goal is to help every student figure out what they want to do with their careers, and each module is a chance for them to do so.

Of the 1,300 total hours the program requires, 200 of those are dedicated to an internship. Students can work with the internship coordinator to find a placement in the industry of their choosing, which can result in a letter of reference for future employment or even a job right after graduation.

Linda Cook-Atikian, another instructor at Evergreen and the internship coordinator, says the Business Administration in International Trading program covers a range of skills that she knows the employers she works with are seeking in new hires.

“(Companies) want people with customer focus on the front lines.”

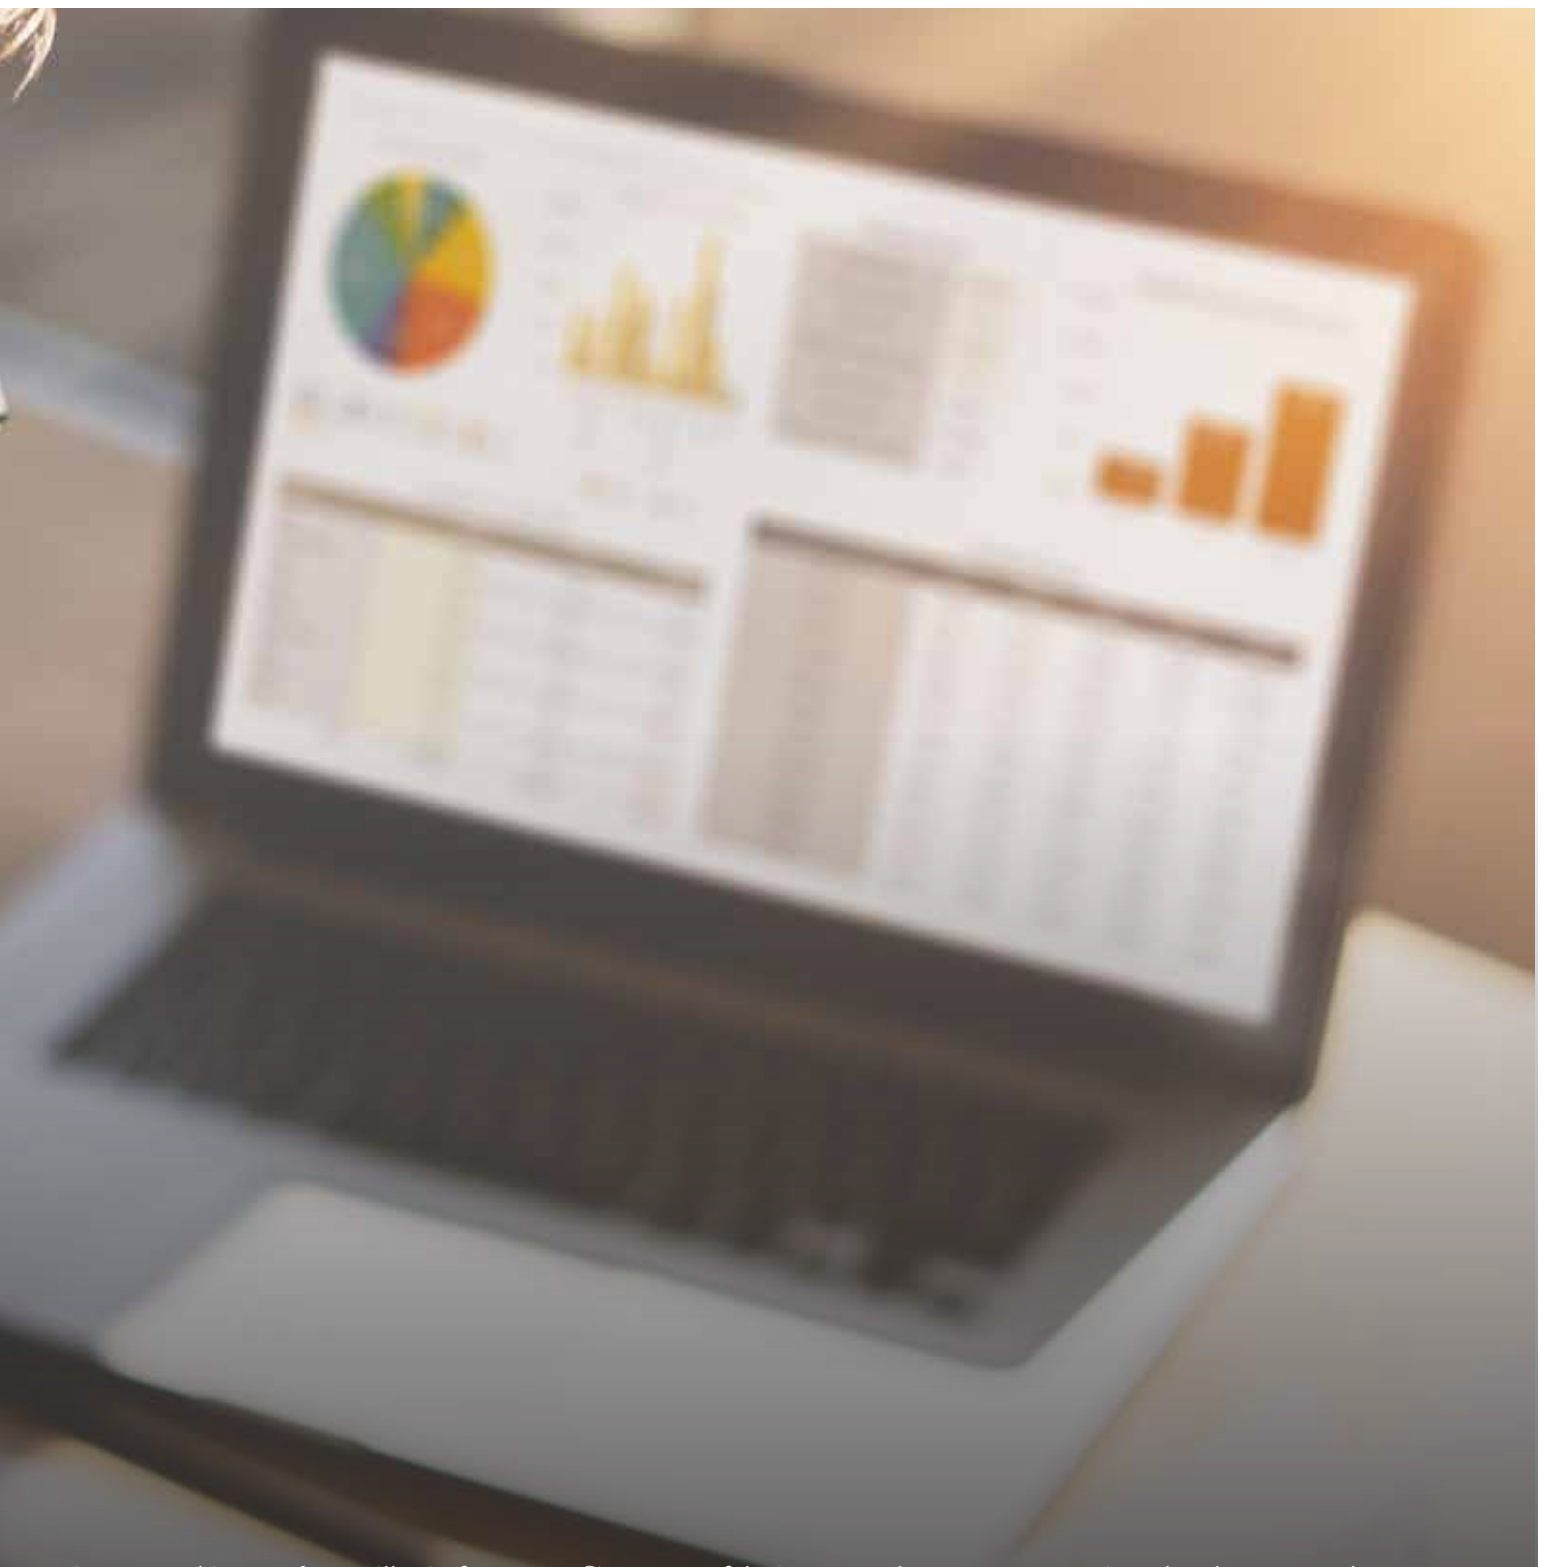

– Linda Cook-Atikian, instructor and internship coordinator, Evergreen College

These skills include financial literacy and customer relations.

"It doesn't matter what company it is, that seems to be what they want," says Cook-Atikian, who works with students to find an internship that best suits their career goals. "They want people with customer focus on the front lines."

Based on that relationship with employers, Cook-Atikian says the program stays relevant to make sure students are learning up-to-date skills involving the latest technology and business practices.

Cook-Atikian says one of the most important things students will gain from the program is a professional attitude and a handle on some of the basic attributes employers value in any industry. She says students are expected to be as punctual, professional and communicative as they would be at work, in an effort to instill positive work habits that will serve them well in their internships and beyond.

"If we're not preparing them to go out there and be good employees, then what are we doing?" she says. "We're career coaches here, all of us."

Since most of the instructors have at some point been employers themselves, she says they know what companies are looking for in an applicant.

"We know what success looks like," says Cook-Atikian. "That's where the bar is set."

She says these skills will be of the utmost important when students do their 10-week internship, which results in a performance evaluation that can be used as a reference later. Some students even end up with a job offer, depending on the openings that the company has.

Cook-Atikian says Evergreen's students receive largely positive reviews from companies providing internships, and adds that though the college provides training and expertise, it's up to the student to take those teachings and apply them in a workplace setting.

"If you're amazing, it's because you earned it," she says. "Once you've got that amazing evaluation, you can take it to any employer in the future."
